There are few examples of the success of large prospective cohort studies in the development of specific areas of research. This paper presents the background to the Prospective National Family Planning Programme (PNFP) study. It provides a preliminary description of the study, and describes the pilot phase, and outlines the study protocol, setting objectives and study population. The study draws data from women's responses to a demographic survey and a clinic questionnaires. The pilot study has demonstrated the feasibility of the proposed cohort study, but also highlighted some of the complexities that will be encountered during the main study. In particular, the small and highly mobile study population, the social stratification of study population, and, most importantly, the complexity of data collection.Sailing in monomotor (manually steered sailing ship), so the first pass was considered a victory with one of the few, if any, hardy specimens of the seal class, Bigwig.
